

National Weather Service Issues Special Weather Statement About Arctic Front

An arctic front will move through southern New England early this morning and will be followed by blustery northwest winds and much colder air. Temperatures will fall through the 30s today near the coast and into the 20s in the interior this afternoon. Afternoon wind chills will drop into the teens and 20s.

Wind chills tonight will fall through the teens and into the single numbers with near zero wind chills for some locations in the higher terrain of interior northern Massachusetts. This will be quite the change from the mild fall we have experienced.

If you plan on being outdoors tonight, be prepared for bitter cold wind chills and dress accordingly for conditions more typical of mid winter.